Scottish Independence Referendum

The Scottish Independence Referendum was notable for several reasons. First of all it gave the vote to 16 and 17 year olds for the first time. Also because, if successful, it would have led to the breakup of the 300 year old United Kingdom. Finally, it was notable for the high level of political debate and interest within Scotland during the campaign.

Across all 32 council areas in Scotland, 85% of voters participated and when all of the votes had been counted, the result was clear: Scotland had chosen to remain part of the United Kingdom by a margin of 55% to 45%. Over 3.6 million votes were cast. Just over 2 million voters chose to place their "X" in the "NO" box in responding to the question "Should Scotland be an Independent Country?".

In the days and weeks that followed, political scientists tried to provide reasons why people voted the way they did. Although the average turnout was 85%, this figure varied greatly between areas with different socio-economic profiles. Of the 32 Scottish council areas, 4 voted YES. What is striking is that each of these 4 areas had high levels of poverty and social deprivation.

The influence of age as a factor was considered by many, particularly as 16 and 17 year olds were allowed to vote. However, it may have been the decisions of older voters rather than their younger counterparts that were important, particularly as older voters are more likely to turn out in higher numbers. Female voters seemed to be swayed more by the NO campaign's arguments.

Saudi Arabia: First women councillors elected

Women have been elected to local councils in Saudi Arabia for the first time after a ban on women taking part in elections was lifted. At least four women were elected, the state-run Saudi Press Agency (SPA) reported. Other news agencies put the number between 9 and 17. The vote is being seen as a landmark in the conservative kingdom. However, the local councils have limited powers.

Saudi women still face many curbs in public life, including driving. Officials said about 130,000 women had registered to vote in the poll, compared with 1.35 million men. The disparity was attributed by female voters to bureaucratic obstacles and a lack of transport. Female candidates were also not allowed to address male voters directly during campaigning. Turnout was high, state media reported. There were 2100 council seats available in the vote. An additional 1050 seats are appointed with approval from the King.

Salma bint Hizab al-Oteibi was named as Saudi Arabia's first elected female politician, after winning a seat on a local council. She was running against seven men and two women, the electoral authorities said.

Women Today in Saudi Arabia

A few Saudi women have risen to the top of the medical profession; for example, Dr. Ghada Al-Mutairi heads a medical research center in California and Dr. Salwa Al-Hazzaa is head of the ophthalmology department at King Faisal Specialist Hospital in Riyadh and was the late King Fahad's personal ophthalmologist.

In August 2013, a law was passed which made domestic violence against women illegal. The law carries penalties of up to 12 months in jail and a fine of 50,000 riyals ($13,000). However, convictions under this law are very rare. In Saudi courts the testimony of one man equals that of two women in family and inheritance law.

Elections of any kind are rare in Saudi Arabia and the recent election was only the third time in history that Saudis had gone to the polls. There were no elections at all between 1965 and 2005. The decision to allow women to take part in recent elections was taken by the late King Abdullah and is seen as a key part of his legacy. In announcing the reforms, King Abdullah said women in Saudi Arabia "have demonstrated positions that expressed correct opinions and advice".

Although Saudi Arabia imposes a strict dress code on women throughout the country, female newsreaders working for Al-Arabia news network which is partly owned by the son of the late King Fahad, are encouraged to adopt a Western dress code.

Before King Abdullah died in January 2015, he appointed 30 women to the country's Consultative Assembly, the Shura Council. But seats alone don't guarantee rights. Saudi Arabia's Consultative Assembly can propose laws, but ultimately only the king has the power to pass them.
